The Chilian authorities asked that the Peruvian mails may be forwarded to Callao, but the United States declined, on the ground that compliance would seem to officially recognize the right of the Chilian government to take possession of the Peruvian postal system.

They reached the city at 7.30 o'clock in the evening, and marched to the Battle House, where they broke ranks and partook of an elegant repast. They were presented with badges and miniature and social converse was kept up until the trial left for the North.
